Q: Function within function, nothing gets printed I am currently writing a simple Python function within a function, but the print function doesn't seem to work: def func_1(): print ("value 1") def func_2(): print ("value 2") func_2() func_1() I have tried this with Python 2.6 and 3.3, and the result is that nothing gets printed. Is it possible to make this work in Python, or is there a solution outside of Python? As @JosefZ comments, the difference between Python 2 and 3.3 is that, in Python 3, print is a function of object, and not an (optional) method of the class. In Python 2, print was implemented as a class method, but you can still use print to output a string. Since you're using Python 3.3, you should instead use: print('value 1') print('value 2') Typography Share This New figures on cybercrime have revealed that the number of criminal attacks perpetrated by Russians increased by a huge 18% in 2017. One report published by Global Firepower – an independent, non-partisan organisation dedicated to identifying the key threats facing the international community – revealed the shocking figures on how cybercrime had risen in the past year. It also highlighted that 2016 was a year of record-breaking attacks that cost the world's economies billions of pounds. The report found that attacks on financial institutions and the energy sector were up by 31% and 17% respectively, while ransomware – a malicious software program that locks down a machine until a ransom is paid – spiked by 43%. Despite these alarming statistics, experts have warned that cybercrime is a global problem that is "growing rapidly" and becoming increasingly dangerous to businesses. According to the report, cybercriminals are not only using more sophisticated technology, but are also getting bolder and are increasingly willing to target industries that are crucial to the country. It adds that nation states, criminal networks, and terrorist
