Yet, the world's biggest economy, the United States, remains awash with old trains that spend millions of dollars to make their passengers miserable. Most of those trains are rickety, slow and ill-suited to run on high-speed corridors, which are already clogged with traffic. And the problem is getting worse. The Los Angeles-to-Las Vegas route, which carries some 170,000 passengers a day, is now, for example, stuck in traffic on Interstate 15, a road that has no shoulders, so that passengers have to try to avoid slipping into the slow lane. And the CTA - the Chicago Transit Authority, which runs the world's busiest commuter rail system, and has promised to be the model for the next generation of high-speed trains in the United States - has failed to replace all of its trains. Many of them, says John J. Audette, a University of Illinois researcher who studied CTA's trains in the 1990s, are "old, short and squat, as if they were still on the main line." And they have caused "minor - but measurable - traumas," including having "electrical failures and problems with safety. Sustaining a population of 50 million residents without new tracks, bridges or even junctions is impractical, as rail experts know. But building the infrastructure for a city of four times that size will be a major headache. "Right now, we're just plowing a straight line," says Audette, who teaches at the University of Illinois at Chicago. "I think it's a question of when, not if." Here's a look at the fastest-growing mode of transportation in the world, the train, and how it fares in the United States. Next-gen. Less than a decade ago, an enormous boom in global
