Requirements: Windows XP or higher More infos on Google Play : table below gives the migration pattern for the common tame housefly, Musca domestica. See table 1 for a list of the migratory host plants and table 2 for the list of the terrestrial trophic stage of the insect.

Home range	Host plants	Terrestrial trophic stage	Adult
Undetermined	Reproductive pair	Mound	Field margin
Breeding season	May - June	Asteraceae (Asteraceae)
Mesocotylus	Summer	Summer	Larvae Asteraceae

houseflies is difficult to determine. While a field experiment was performed in Pittsburgh (Odland and Spence, 1967), to date no one has attempted to quantify the home range size of native houseflies. Many factors including site type (urban, semi-urban, or rural), season and time of day must be considered in estimating the home range size of homely houseflies (see the table at right). In the Pittsburgh study the home range of a homely housefly in the summer ranged from about 16-46 meters; however, one fly was observed to home in a man's hand for 6 hours (Odland and Spence, 1967). Home range sizes of many other houseflies are not known. Such information is valuable as it might provide insights on host plant preferences and life histories of the host plants. For example, it was noted that smaller home range sizes were observed for flies that fed on smaller hosts. One fly was observed to feed on a Queen Anne's lace (Daucus carota) weed up to 8 hours. The table at right indicates the approximate fly size for each trophic stage. The size of the average female and adult are shown. See the table at left for the average length of the reproductive stages of housefly. The table at right indicates the approximate fly size for each trophic stage.
