Marketing devices are increasingly used by larger companies and organizations, and when used properly, can be a powerful tool for increasing brand awareness, deepening customer loyalty, and converting customers into purchases. If the marketing device is well integrated into marketing, it can often be a component of a company's overarching communications strategy. Marketing devices may include traditional advertising, product placement, product sponsorship, sponsorship of events, discount programs, and more. Some devices are used exclusively for marketing, while others have a secondary objective to provide a social utility or cultural awareness. Recognition In 2006, the Advertising Research Foundation

(ARF) named "marketing device" the #11 most overused and abused term in advertising for the past twenty-five years. In 2010, the Marketing Science Institute (MSI) named "marketing device" the #3 most overused term. Types Devices are classified into four types: Marketing devices are features or services offered by a company that have the effect of increasing the awareness of the brand. For example, airline companies frequently pay for advertising on sports teams, movies, and award shows. Commerce devices are offered by companies to prompt consumers to visit their businesses. For example, in Europe, it is common for auto manufacturers to offer their cars as prizes in promotional sweepstakes. Funder devices are offered by companies as a means of gaining media exposure. For example, a music company might create a downloadable song that plays on request for example, or a restaurant company might donate a portion of the food sold during a promotional period to a local charity. Impulse devices are offered by companies to their customers as a means to generate short-term sales. For example, after winning a game contest, customers might be given the chance to receive a free bonus
