to the production of fuel cells, and in particular to a fuel cell having a carbon based film layer and a process for producing such fuel cells. Fuel cells are electrochemical energy conversion devices that convert chemical energy derived from a fuel such as hydrogen or methanol, or from an organic fuel such as glucose, ethanol or natural gas, directly into electrical energy. The basic process of a fuel cell electrochemically combines a fuel and an oxidant to produce an electrical current and heat energy.

The most common fuel cell is based upon the reaction of hydrogen and oxygen at high temperature to produce electricity (electricity generation), heat and water. In general, fuel cells may be classified as follows: (1) molten carbonate fuel cells that operate at approximately 800° C. with a liquid electrolyte; (2) solid oxide fuel cells that operate at temperatures from approximately 600° C. to about 1,000° C. with an ionic conductor made of a ceramic material. In solid oxide fuel cells, a fuel such as hydrogen or a hydrocarbon is reacted electrochemically at the anode, while oxygen from the air is
