Acute gastric dilatation after pyloric stenosis repair in a preterm neonate. This is the first report of acute gastric dilatation after pyloric stenosis repair in a neonate. A premature infant (26 weeks' gestation) underwent pyloric stenosis repair in the neonatal period and had a normal weight gain while on total parenteral nutrition. On postoperative day 5, the infant became distressed and had a significant epigastric distention that was diagnosed as gastric dilatation. Initial conservative management was unsuccessful and a surgical reexploration was performed. The gastric contents were found to have shifted to the abdominal cavity, and the dilated stomach was markedly decompressed. The infant recovered, and was discharged home after 5 weeks of total parenteral nutrition. What is the

Childhood Arthritis Risk Reduction Trial? The Childhood Arthritis Risk Reduction Trial (CARR) is an international study funded by the US National Institutes of Health and conducted by University of Southern California. The aim of CARR is to reduce the risk of developing arthritis in young children by evaluating the impact of a series of intensive nutritional interventions on growth, respiratory infections, and early puberty. A diverse community of healthy children,
