Clone brushes are ideal for copying textures from one place to another. For example, you can clone an object or one of your own textures, copy it to a new layer, and paste it into another area, allowing you to reuse your objects and textures in different compositions. You can customize your own brushes in Photoshop by starting with one of the included presets or by using the Brush Preset panel. The Pen tool is useful for drawing lines, curves and squiggles, as well as converting shapes into paths. You can draw with a Pen, or convert a path to a Brush by choosing Path to Brush from the main menu. You can also paint directly on the web. Make sure the Paint as Web option is selected for the Photoshop application: Tools > Web > Paint as Web. One thing you should be aware of when using the Pen tool or the Brush tool is that you can't go back and fix mistakes. You have to start over. If you want to make changes to your Artboard, press Control+Z (Cmd+Z on a Mac), which will Undo the last command. You can also lock your Artboard so that you can't accidentally change it by using the L key on your keyboard. The Gradient tool helps you create gradients, which are useful for creating effects such as light and dark areas. Gradient fills are also useful for creating the look of ordinary, natural colored backgrounds. To use this tool, choose Stroke from the main menu, then select Gradient from the Stroke dialog box. You can then adjust the blending mode and gradient type. You can also choose Solid and Radial Gradients, or Gradient Fill and Gradient Stroke to create different effects. You can create both Linear and Radial Gradients. You use the Linear Gradient for horizontal and vertical color swatches or to create a smooth gradient from one color to another. You use the Radial Gradient for creating a circular gradient with different colors. You can also create a gradient using multiple layers, with each layer representing a color or an effect. You can customize your own Gradient brushes by starting with one of the included presets or by using the Gradient Preset panel. If you make changes to your image, the Gradient tool remains active, so you can use the same settings later. One thing you should be aware of when using the Gradient tool or the Brush tool is that you can't

What's New In?

The Brush Tool lets you paint and create new images. You can create vivid effects and use a variety of brush types to help you create a unique look. To create a brush, you click and drag on the Brush Tool and place a selection around an area of your image. You can add a paint effect, gradient, or paint brush texture to your brush. You can also apply a type of effect to your brushes, such as Soft Light, Hard Light, Vivid Light, Color Burn or Color Dodge. [Photoshop] To adjust your brush, use the Size, Shape, and Opacity buttons. You can make your brush size larger by clicking the Increase Size button or smaller by clicking the Decrease Size button. To adjust the color of your brush, click the Color Control button. Select the color that you want your brush to use, and use the keys on the controls to adjust the color. You can change the brush type. Use the Type drop-down menu to select brush type. If you don't want to paint a particular color, you can select Darken instead of Lighten. You can even use other brush options, such as the Filter Brush, Scatter Brush, and Watercolor Brush. The Gradient Tool lets you make lines, fills, and gradients in your image. You can make these lines, fills, and gradients soft, hard, or blended. To use the Gradient Tool, click and drag on your image to make a selection, and then click and drag to make a line or fill. You can use your linear gradient, radial gradient, or checkered gradient. You can vary the intensity of the gradient by clicking the plus/minus keys to increase or decrease the tone. [Photoshop] You can also move and rotate the line or fill you've made. You can erase the fill to remove it, and you can change the color or gradient of the line by clicking on the Fill or Stroke button. Finally, you can add a drop shadow to your gradient. [Photoshop] You can use the Pen Tool to create vectors and freehand lines and shapes in your image. For more control, you can use the Pen Tool to copy and paste shapes and lines. To use the Pen Tool, click and drag to create an initial selection on your image. Then, click on the shape you want to use, and then click on the shape you want to delete.
