The effect of air pollution on the early detection of breast cancer: A panel study. The early detection of breast cancer (BC) is a high priority, but environmental factors have been shown to be associated with earlier stage at diagnosis and a decrease in overall survival (OS) in several types of cancer, including BC. This study aims to evaluate whether exposure to air pollution is associated with the early detection of BC. This is a prospective observational cohort study, conducted in the south region of Spain from 2009 to 2013. Data were drawn from the Valencia's Breast Cancer Early Detection Program. This is a study on women aged 40 years or over diagnosed with a first BC, and also participating in the Valencia's BC Early Detection Program. Linear regression was used to compare the percentage of first-year BC patients who were diagnosed in a more-favorable stage (pT1-T2, pN0-N1 and pM0-M1) according to pollutant levels, controlling for confounding factors. A total of 105,271 women were included, 5,102 (4.9%) of whom (age range 40-69 years) had a first BC and were diagnosed within one year. The percentage of BC cases diagnosed in a more-favorable stage was 20.4% among air pollutants ranges between 0-100 µg/m3. The adjusted odds ratios (AOR) were not associated with air pollutants: cumulative (0-100 µg/m3): AOR=0.99, 95% confidence interval (CI) (0.95-1.02); 15-24-hours: AOR=0.99, 95% CI (0.96-1.03); 24-hour: AOR=0.98, 95% CI (0.95-1.02). The results found in this study do not support a relationship between air pollutants and early detection of BC. Air pollution levels should be considered when monitoring the early detection of BC. Mozilla Project Manager Luke Massa and Mozilla Research Product Director Wei-chun Ma have published a research report titled "Threat Modeling Usability Requirements for Enterprise Content Discovery in Mozilla XUL Applications" (PDF). This report, which appeared on the Mozilla Research site on May 21, has been nearly five years in the making. The Mozilla Research team conducted a study of 10,000 Firefox users to determine users' perceptions of the ease of use of content discovery, specifically the behavior of Firefox's content discovery features.
